The Performance

Synopsis

The Lucky Children is a dream-like ride that dives into the inner universe of three people grappling with memory disorders. The events take place on a desolate, windswept beach while they strive to rekindle their memories; in a world where past and present have merged, desperately clinging to the remnants of their fading memories as a lifeline, they celebrate these dimming recollections before they vanish entirely. On stage, the boundaries between childhood and old age blur and dissolve in a poignant display.

The three performers, clad in surrealistic costumes as if designed by Dalí, move as though on a summer beach. They embody the carefree nature of children and, at times, the zest of teenagers. As the show progresses, we are drawn into a world with its own unique rules and laws, accessible only through the mind of someone with disappearing memories. This performance acts as a magical gateway into this realm, offering a peek at elderly individuals in states of joy and play yet interspersed with harsher realities of aging and limited time. Occasionally, their resurfacing memories offer glimpses into their past, piecing together forgotten memories into a poignant portrait."

The Genre

The show is a visual performance experience, relying mainly on the performers' movements and actions and not much on the spoken words or text. A journey in which its narration is created out of images, sounds, and smells.

Auditory

The soundscape is one of the fundamental components of this show; it functions as a bridge to connect the present to the past and the internal universe of the elderly. Furthermore, the soundscape surrounds the viewers/listeners, manipulating their sensations and testing their hearing, especially when a minimalistic sound is played.

As most of the performance depends on showing rather than talking, there are a few dialogues. Recorded conversations are used as the performers' inner voices. In certain scenes, dialogue is projected as text on the front screen, reminiscent of the silent film era.

Olfactory

The scentography is used in the show as a hidden element of scenography. The entire space, including the viewer's seats, will smell like an ocean. Using a device designed to safely diffuse specific smells, such as the Ocean's smell, considering allergic viewers. Thematically, smells are the best representation of disappearing memories. Exposure to a specific smell he/she used to smell in the past could make this person revive this specific day or event and then gradually disappear again.

The Motivation

I was sitting on the sofa next to my mother after (AD) Alzheimer's disease had struck her two years ago; I watched her; she was physically fine and still intelligent. She could move, walk, watch TV, smile, and talk. Her body was still the same, but at the same time, she was no longer there. My mother, the one I used to know, disappeared.

At that moment, I was scared, not only because of what had happened to her but also because this question confronted me: Who are we without memory and history?

History, preserved and transmitted through written texts or stories we tell, was the device that allowed us to accumulate our collective experiences, build civilizations, and shape our identities. And to me, history at an individual level is memory - they function the same but on different scales. But what happens to us if we lose - partly or entirely - memories and history? At that moment, I started thinking about The Lucky Children as a project that dives into the notion of memories and history as essential parts of our identity. The human being.

The Fading Memories and History...

This show discusses Alzheimer's disease, not as a medical study nor a sociopolitical analysis of the aging process but as a study case and an entrance to a broader philosophical question about memories and history and their role in shaping humankind, tackling questions around the fragility of our bodies and our mortality, which so often seems to contradict the self-concept of modern humankind.

The show significantly contemplates the relationship between ourselves and our memories/history when they fade out. While (AD) Alzheimer's disease is about lack and fading OUT memories, The Lucky Children is about recalling and demonstrating memories, re-fading them IN, and celebrating them before they ultimately disappear.
